13 Super Skills to Change Your (Working) Life Forever
 ...and find yourself without getting lost in the quest for end...
 ISBN 978-3-96739-205-0

- A call to take ownership of how we think, feel and act
- A source of inspiration and guidance for the new world of work
- An empowering read for anyone seeking to grow, make an impact and build a working life on their own terms

Work as we know it is coming to an end. Instead of switching on our computers in the morning and dutifully grinding through an assigned to-do list, we will increasingly choose the projects we commit to. We will become curators of the work we do.

Hierarchies, too, are beginning to shift. Young graduates or trainees fresh out of education may soon outpace their managers in terms of current knowledge – not least because of new tools, artificial intelligence and automation.

In a working world in flux, the ability to lead ourselves is an increasingly fundamental skill. At its best, it unlocks greater freedom in the career path we pursue; more influence over where, how and with whom we work; and more flexibility in deciding when work happens. As entirely new roles and professions emerge – many of which do not even exist today – it also equips us to keep pace with change.

When we commit to investing in ourselves and our skills, we multiply our opportunities; we open up more ways to turn our working lives into something that truly fits our aspirations.

Ali Mahlodji is a multi-award-winning entrepreneur, international keynote speaker and bestselling author. Born in Persia and raised in a refugee hostel, Mahlodji was a school dropout who struggled with a stammer. From there, an extraordinary journey via more than 40 jobs took him to the senior echelons of international tech companies. Today, as CEO of futureOne, he supports organisations, leaders, educational institutions and individuals in navigating change.

SPIEGEL best-selling author

What if communication at work fostered clarity and momentum instead of friction?

This book is for anyone who wants to develop how communication works in their organisation – not just in the words that are said, but in how speakers relate to one another. The book invites readers to move towards what the authors call a female mode of dialogue: one defined not by the gender of the person speaking but by skills such as listening, cooperation, empathy and emotional intelligence.

The authors lay the foundations for developing these skills and sharpening them in practice. Along the way, reflective prompts help readers shift the way they conduct conversations and deepen their understanding of how language and behaviour affect relationships.

This book is a compelling call for a new way of relating in leadership and in society at large: more female, more conscious, and powerful in a deeper, more sustainable way.

Balian Buschbaum is founder of the German Academy for Leadership, a SPIEGEL bestselling author and an expert in female leadership, communication and body language. He is a keynote speaker and business coach, supporting leaders and organisations in developing leadership models grounded on in empathy, dialogue and diversity. The advancement of women in the workplace is a particular focus of his work.

With a background in psychology, her work spans academia, business and personal development. She lectures at universities and delivers keynotes for organisations. - Exploring one of the most consequential shifts of our time – how AI is reshaping business, society and the world of work
- AI not as a distant vision or a short-term hype cycle, but the foundation of modern economic value creation
- A timely business and leadership book for an era of exponential change

The next ten years will be pivotal – not least because AI is already transforming business and society in real and tangible ways. No longer a promise of the future, AI is here now: writing texts, analysing data, controlling machines and reshaping how we work.

This book makes a case for action while remaining clear-eyed about the challenges. It walks readers through where AI is already delivering tangible benefits – in offices, industry, retail and public administration. It offers leaders clear entry points and action prompts that move ideas into practice.

The authors speak from first-hand experience. They pair technical expertise with a clear ethical perspective, advocating for AI as an opportunity – not a threat – for organisations, employees and society.

A concept is the unifying thread that runs through every project, idea or initiative. But strong concepts don't emerge by chance. They arise from a systematic approach, rigorous research, precise language and a willingness to question results along the way.

In this book, author Katja Ischebeck presents her roadmap for successful concept development. She explains how to turn ideas into clear, convincing concepts in six structured steps – from clarifying the brief and conducting thorough research to building a logical structure and delivering a persuasive presentation.

This new edition brings artificial intelligence into the concept development process. It features a dedicated excursus on how AI can be meaningfully integrated into concept development alongside proven tools and methods. Used correctly, AI can make concept work easier, faster and often – surprisingly – more creative.

With an academic background in psychology, Katja Ischebeck brings to her writing many years of international experience as a consultant, trainer and coach in HR management and management consultancy. Her work focuses on professional concept development in the context of change processes. She founded and has led Ischebeck Consulting since 2004.

Get to know Gen A

- A sharp snapshot of the values, media habits and attitudes of Generation Alpha (born 2010 onwards)
- Bonus content: Checklist and practical tips for communicating effectively with Gen A Generation Alpha – the age cohort born from 2010 onwards – will begin entering the labour market from 2025-26. Succeeding Generation Z, they are the first true AI natives: seamlessly digital from the time they can talk, growing up with TikTok at their fingertips, Roblox as an everyday pastime and kidfluencers as role models. Shaped by global connectivity, uncertainty and disruptive technologies, this generation thinks, feels, consumes and learns in fundamentally different ways from their predecessors.

This book maps the values, media habits and expectations of Generation Alpha. It shows how research can be applied in practice to speak to a radically digital generation, from brand communication to attracting future talent. Drawing on current studies and best-practice examples, it helps organisations engage with Gen Alpha as both a powerful consumer group and the key shapers of tomorrow.

Tina Sprung is a marketing strategist, university lecturer, editor and founder of the Sprungbrett digital agency in St Gallen. She teaches strategic marketing, consumer psychology and digital communication at IU International University and Macromedia University of Applied Sciences. Generation Alpha – the cohort to which her future students, employees and customers belong – is her current main research focus and a central topic in her teaching.

Narcissism is suddenly on everyone's lips. The words narcissist and narcissistic are thrown around so casually that their true impact is often overlooked. Yet left unchecked, narcissism can cause serious damage – in our private lives and at work.

At the same time, the most problematic narcissistic traits are becoming more visible across society. Prolonged exposure to people with strong narcissistic tendencies – or a narcissistic personality disorder – can have serious consequences for mental and emotional health. Organisations, too, are feeling the effects. Declining employee loyalty is frequently linked to unhealthy leadership.

This book explains how to recognise harmful forms of narcissism and respond effectively to typical narcissistic behaviour patterns and structures.

Dr. phil. Linda Dahm holds a PhD in social sciences and spent a number of years in teaching and research at the University of Trier. Her experience further spans various leadership roles within the financial services sector.

Today she works as an independent consultant, certified business coach, career coach and trainer with a focus on personal and organisational development. The topic of narcissism in everyday life and the workplace has been a core pillar of her work for almost a decade.

Uncovering hidden potential

- Recognise the strengths associated with neurodivergence and create working environments where they can thrive
- The book offers support to neurodivergent people in better understanding themselves and unlocking their individual potential

Neurodiversity and neuroinclusion are shaping the future of organisations and of society as a whole. After all, we all think differently – and that diversity is a strength.

Our brains are wired in different ways, with only around 80 per cent of us fitting what are considered as dominant neurological norms. These individuals are described as neurotypical. The rest are neurodivergent, meaning their neurological makeup differs from the norm. Research highlights the valuable strengths and abilities neurodivergent people – including those who are highly sensitive, autistic, or have AD(H)D – can contribute to organisations and society.

Discover why neurological differences are a valuable asset, where the often hidden strengths of neurodivergent people lie, and how organisations can benefit from embracing neurodiversity.

With an academic background in education, psychology and speech science, Kristin Kluck has worked as a freelance coach and speaker across the German-speaking world since 2009. She discovered her own high sensitivity in 2011. Since then, she has drawn extensively on both her professional expertise and personal experience in her coaching work with a wide range of companies and leaders. Kluck's work also focuses strongly on neurodiversity, particularly in organisational contexts.
